Week in Review

This week was great! I explored and learned a lot about Git. Thanks to Professor Robin for helping me. I was stuck with Codenvy, but she recommended me to use SourceTree, which is the best client for Git. I liked this week's Call to Action assignment. It was an easy assignment since I have plenty of quotes. I got to share one of my favorite Steve Jobs quote. A flow chart helps programmers save time. I created my first flow chart via an online tool at draw.io. The tool made it very easy for me to create the chart. I look forward to creating flow charts in my career.

Reflect and Connect:

My development this week was over communicating with clarity. One thing I remember the most out of it is that an effective communicator has already won half of a battle. I understand this since English is my second language. I need to make communication one of my major strength. I will do it by practicing it more. I improved with Git. I finally learned how to push my files to my repo. I will keep my repo updated. I already took time off from work since next week is the final week of this course. I will use my time to finish all assignments of my Career Module course and this course.
